The law of copyright also has a role to play with regards to photographs. As the law originally stood, the copyright in a photograph belonged to the photographer. In the earlier days, when cameras were not ordinarily available, the position was that one went to a photo studio to have his picture taken, and the shop retained the copyright. For that purpose, negatives were retained. At present, the copyright in a photograph belongs to the person who makes the arrangement for the taking of the photographs. But when a person takes a photograph himself or asks another to take a photograph of him, then he will own the copyright. On a different note, the copyright for a photograph is a property right. In a way, it is an intangible right because it is not a right to the physical ownership but reproduction rights. The copyright owner can transfer the right by assigning such interest to a person of his choice.
