Law for everyone

There is little in law that deals directly with photography. However, various laws apply to photographs that are taken and used. There are various situations where action can be taken against one person or another, depending on how the photograph is produced and how it is then used. Nevertheless, the basic thing is that one does not have an absolute unfettered right to one's own image. Another person can take your photograph and in some ways use it. A person may be sitting in the privacy of his own home, but a picture of him may be taken from outside the house. The irony of it is that the right to reproduce the picture belongs to the person who makes the arrangement for the taking of the photograph, and not the person who appears in it.
